

JPAS Special Edition:

The Association for the Study of Classical African Civilizations

The Journal of Pan African Studies (www.jpanafrican.com) will host a special issue on the history and impact of the Association for the Study of Classical African Civilizations (ASCAC) in memory of Queen Nzinga Ratibisha Heru. Since 1984 ASCAC has advanced an independent effort to raise the consciousness of the African community around the world, which has significantly influenced educational discourse in the United States in regards to the African origins of humanity, curriculum reform, and academic freedom.

Contributions to this edition are welcomed in the form of research papers, interviews, and research-based audio-visual presentations on the following themes, and beyond: The rescuing, reconstruction and restoration of African history and culture, The promotion of the study of African civilizations, African centered study group formation, Leadership: founders, council of elders; The quest for excellence and perfection, Inter-organizational relationships, Achievements and accomplishments, Knowledge for liberation, The international agenda, Organizational virtues, ASCAC in historical context, African World History Project, Ancient Kemet Studies

The selection criteria will involve: relevance to theme, clarity of paper, intellectual significance, and originality. Contributors must send a 50 word abstract by December 15, 2011, and their final paper by May 15, 2012 (the paper and abstract must include contributors name, affiliation, title, and e-mail address) to jpanafrican@yahoo.com.

The Journal of Pan African Studies is a trans-disciplinary peer reviewed scholarly journal devoted to the intellectual synthesis of research, scholarship and critical thought on the African experience. Since our inception in 1987, we have provided an international forum for diverse scholars to advance a host of perspectives and theoretical paradigms relevant to the social, political, economic and cultural issues that impact the African world community.
